

Proceeding with the FCC's plans to permit greater consolidation of ownership of media outlets would clearly not serve the interests of democracy. The popular media today are already heavily slanted toward privilege; permitting their ownership to be even more concentrated would only further dilute the value of the news that they report. The result would be a more poorly-informed public and a weaker democracy.